Dear Sir Keir Starmer,

I am a thirteen-year-old boy who attends Wollaton School, and recently we have been reading a book called 'Boy 87'. It's a book about two boys attempting to escape their country for a better life. I never cared for refugees until we as a year group started reading this book. It has completely changed my view on them, and hearing what they go through is appalling. This letter is being written to you today in hope of finding a solution to them coming to our country.

I know you are already doing a lot for them and I'm glad that we are doing our part for these people. But there are thousands that have to evacuate their country to protect themselves from being killed, so they risk their lives attempting to cross to our border. Young children and adults are afraid to leave their country, afraid to leave their home and they are scared for their life.

I would like to share some of my ideas with you in the hopes of making their cross either safer or their protection better. Perhaps even something as simple as granting more refugee camps in their countries would be a solution, if they cannot afford the large sum of money to cross over.

All in all, the book has inspired me to try find a way for refugees' lives to improve, and I hope that you will be inspired to help them too, and show the world that Britain does care, that we want to help them in any way we can.

Thank you for taking the time to read this letter, and I really do hope that we can help do more for them than what we are right now.

Yours Sincerely,
Zac Holman
